count of an alleged lack of hospitality on the part of the South Carolina military during the recent Fair at Columbia. A Richmond drummer who was in Charlotte a day or two ago tells of how he made this thing pay recently. He had just finished a tour of South Carolina. He struck several merchants who were in need of goods in his line, but who did not feel themselves able to buy just then. He tried every other art on them, and failing with all of them, finally reminded them of the fact that the people of Richmond felt a little "cut" on account of the treatment which their military had received in Columbia, and suggested that South Carolina owed something to the late capital of the Confederacy on this ground. The drummer avers that he never used this argument in a single instance that it was not followed by an order for a bill of goods. The South Carolinians are jealous of the reputation of their State, and this drummer is business to the last.
